Randy Paus's Last Lecture has had a certain effect on me because of how positive he was even though he knew that this was the last time he would lecture. Instead of letting his talk be mostly be about his illness, he talked about his dreams as a kid, the things he has learned, and the importance of working for what you want. The things that had the most effect on me was when he talked about obstacles. He explained that obstacles are not there to make us stop going towards our goals. Sometimes they can shed light on the things we want the most. I think that this is so very important to know because it can be easy to just give up when it gets too hard or it doesn't go with what we originally had planned in our heads.

I also liked his message on going after what you dream of and to not be scared of changing the way you get to them. Currently being a senior in college, I feel very much pressured to already know what I really want to do in my life. I have dreams that I really want to experience, but I know that getting to every single one of them might not be the smoothest. Listening to him talk got me to think that having some challenges in the way doesn't always mean that I'm never going to meet my goals and I should just give up on them.

Another part that really stood out after watching the video was his attitude towards his own life. Even when he is facing something very hard, he still has a good sense of humor and tries to always think of the people and experiences that mean the absolute most to him. It got me thinking on how easy it is to be stressed out about such small things when people really should be a lot more appreciative of what is going on right in front of them.
