The different types of learning styles are a very interesting topic since every person seems to have a certain way that they like to learn with. For some people they like to see things like pictures or videos while others like to just listen to someone explain how something is done or they like to do hands-on learning. Personally I like to think that these preferences have the power to affect how comfortable we are feeling when we learn something new. A good example that I am able to think of is that I sometimes understand a subject better when I can see how things are done like in a video and not just by listening to a person do a lecture about a certain topic.

However, after watching the video and learning a lot more about the other types of learning styles, I don't believe that people should be put into a certain category. Those categories could be visual learning or auditory learner. Just because a person likes one type of method doesn't mean that is the only one that would work for them. Different subjects may need a different method. Like if you are in a math class you might like seeing how a problem is solved while in a history class you would like to just listen to a teacher talk.

I believe that the best way to learn is to combine the learning styles. Reading, listening, watching videos, taking notes, and practicing can all be very helpful when trying to learn a new topic. We should not be limiting ourselves to one type of learning method and instead be figuring out which types work the best for certain subjects. I think that having a preference in the way we learn is very important, but we should most definitely not be defining what we are capable of learning.
